

I am a frequent business (three times per month) and personal (once per quarter) traveler; an am opposed to the use of cell phones on planes. To allow this would be an infringement on my privacy and create an hostile environment due to the lack of space between seats. Airports and restaruants are filled with loud users; at least I can get up and find some privacy. In a plane, I have no where to go for quiet, to relax and work. Allowing this would only lead to problems.

The only logical reason I can think of for you to seriously consider this, is pressure from the phone companies who only see additional revenue.

I would be pleased to make a formal presentation to a committee, on this topis.

Thanks you,

Bill Owens
